Team Charter

Written together, in the room. Every norm should survive the question: will we actually do this in Week 11?

Project _____

1 · The project & the team

The one-line rationale we converged on

MEMBER	STARTING ROLE — WHAT THEY OWN FIRST	INITIALS

2 · Starting roles

Lean responsibilities, not job titles — they will flex as the work reveals itself.

Maintainer — who makes the final call when the team can't agree

How roles will change as the work reveals itself

3 · Communication

Where the team talks (channel)

Expected response time — be realistic ("within 24h on weekdays" beats "always on")

What is urgent enough to interrupt someone, and how

4 · Meeting cadence

When we meet outside class, and for how long

What every meeting must produce

5 · Decision-making

Calls the maintainer makes alone

Calls that need the whole team

On a deadlock — the named tiebreaker, and the rule they use

6 · "Pulling your weight"

Hours per week outside class each of us commits to

What visible contribution looks like (issues taken, PRs opened, reviews done…)

The uncomfortable one: what happens the first time someone misses a commitment?

Who says something, how soon, and what happens next — kindly, directly, before it festers.

7 · How we'll change this charter

It's a living document. Amending it by agreement when reality proves a norm wrong is maturity, not failure.

Working solo? Fill in §4 as your own working cadence, §5 as the habit you'll use to record decisions and their reasons, and §6 as what "on track" means for you each week — you'll set these same norms for contributors later.

We wrote this together and agree to hold each other to it. Initials:
